BRADDOCH'S GRAVE.

The place where Braddock was buried is in Fayette county, Pa., and between fifty-three ang fifty-four miles from Cumberland, Maryland, a few rods north of the National road. There had long existed a tradition in this region that Braddock was killed by one of his own men, and more recent developments leave little or no doubt of the fact. A communication some time since appeared in a Washington paper, written by a gentleman whose authority is good on such points, which says: "When my father was removing with his family to the West, one of the Fausetts kept a public house, near where Union town now stands, the county seat of Fayette, Pa. In this man's house we lodged about the 10th of October, 1781, twentysix years and a few months after Braddock's defeat, and there it was made anything but a sceret that one of the family dealt the death blow to the British General. "Thirteen years afterwards I met Thomas Fausett in Fayette county, then, as he told me, in his 70th year. To him I put the plain question, and received the plain reply: 'I did shoot him!' He then went on to insist that, by doing so, he contributed to save what was left of the army. In brief, in my youth I never heard the fact either doubted or blamed that Fousett shot Braddock."

Hon. Andrew Stewart, of Uniontown, Pa. says his father knew and often conversed with Tom. Fausett, who did not hesitate to avow, in the presence of his friends that he shot Gen. Braddock. Fausett was a man of gigantic frame, of uncivilized, half savage propensities, who spent most of his life among the mountains as a hermit, living on the game which he killed. He would occasionally come into town and get drunk; sometimes he would repel inquiries into the affair of Braddock's death, by putting his fingers to his lips, and uttering a sort of buzzing sound; at other times he would burst into tears, and appear greatly agitated by conflicting passions.

In spite of Braddock's silly order that the troops should not protect themselves behind the trees, Joseph Fausett had taken such position, when Braddock rode up in passion, and struck him down with his sword. Tom Fausett, who was but a short distance from his brother, saw the whole transaction, and immediately drew up his rifle and shot Braddock through the lungs, partly in revenge for the outrage upon his brother, and partly, as he always alleged, to get the General out of the way, and thus save the remainder of the gallant band who had been sacrificed to his obstinacy and want of experience in frontier war-

After Braddock fell, the retreating soldiers carried their wounded General for four days, until they reached seven miles beyond Dunbar's Royal. camp, where he expired. He was buried in the centre of the road which his advancing army had cut; and to prevent the discovery of dishonor, soldiers, horses and wagons were ited there many years after could mark out the style.

MAPRY. ging away the slope of the hill, they disinterred some bones, with sundry military trappings, which were at once known by the old settlers to be those of Braddock. One and another took some of the most prominent bones, and the others were interred under a tree on the hill. Mr. Stewart afterwards collected the scattered bones from the individuals who had taken them, and sent them to Peale's Museum in Philadelphia.

A plain shingle marked "Braddock's grave" nailed to to the tree where a part of the bones are interred is the only monument to point out to the traveller the resting place of the proud and brave but unfortunate hero of the French

THE VULTURES OF THE HIMALAYAS. -Dr. Andrew Leith Adams, in his "Wanderings of a Naturalist in India," writes as follows of the vulturs and other rapacious birds of the Hi-

Amid all the grandeur of the Himalayas, it is a most attractive sight to the naturalist to behold the vultures and rapacious birds soaring over the vast ravines and around the tops of the mighty mountains. Let him choose a summer evening, with that clear blue sky almost characteristic of the Himalayas, and just as the sun casts his rays on the snow-clad mountainswhen the quiet is only broken by the cry of the in the vast canopy of heaven; while cateering in his majesty, the lammergeyer gathers up his great wings and swoops downwards, mayhap to rise again and join the medley he has lust left, or, stretching forth his pinions to their fullest extent, he sails along the mounlain brow to the projecting cliff on which his eyrie stands safe, for there who dare assail After a bear or other large animal is killed, the hunter soon finds himself surrounded by apacious birds, where none were seen before; they are observed dashing down the glens, and sweep within a few yards of him, others are soaring at higher elevations, and even at such vast altitudes that the huge bearded vulture appears only as a small speck in the blue sky, but gradually it becomes more distinct as its wide gyrations increase.

It may gather itself up and close its wings, or dash in one fell swoop, thousands of feet, and the next instant is seen perched on the lutting rock beside him. Such, then, are the death so the property of the little Tom Thumb, to the most magnificent Parlor Lamp; Cut, Ground and Plain Globes; Chimneys, all kinds and sizes, Brushes, Wick, and all other goods in the trade, at the most reasonable prices. have come; but, if, immediately after his noble ibex has rolled down the crag, he directs his eyes heavenward, he will observe carrion crows or vultures. at various distances vations, sailing leisurely about, while the one nearest to him, observing the death of his quarry, instantly commences to de-cend; then one follows the other until the valley resounds with the horse croaking of the crows, and the air feels alive with them. It is surprising, the numbers that are sometimes observed to con gregate on these occasions; I have seen no less than sixty vultures and crows on and around the carcass of a newly-killed bear.
